Dear [REDACTED]

Further to our meeting on Friday 10 May and our email exchanges on Monday 13 May, as promised I wrote a letter to the Principal of Haberdashers' Asle's Crayford Academy, Richard Farrow, enclosing all the information you had requested I pass on to the school.

I received a response from Mr Farrow in the post this afternoon, which was dated 17 May and is enclosed for your reference. In his letter, Mr Farrow states that a response to your communications was being drafted by their solicitors and would be sent to you the following week, so you should receive this shortly.

Please do let me know when you receive the school's reply.

Yours sincerely

Rt Hon Sir David Evennett
Member of Parliament for Bexleyheath & Crayford

SANITISED VERSION

This information has been put together for legal action against Bexley Mental Health Services NHS (NHS Mental Health), Bexley Children's Social Care Services and Haberdashers' Aske's Crayford Academy. These are referred to collectively as "Bexley Public Services" and the following information will be proven during this process. Because of the complexities of these cases, we are using several law firms specialising in child mental health, human rights, and equality, to demonstrate the damage this has on their victims' mental health and wellbeing.

Child's formative age

It is becoming more common for a council's public services to collaborate with each other, to avoid accountability when mistakes are made. This family's case against Bexley Public Services is compelling. For many years Bexley Public Services have been using this child against their parents.

Under these circumstances, any child in their formative years will remember their own experiences of their family. Children will also believe what they are being told by whoever has daily access to them. The most natural and logical reaction for any child under this much duress will be confusion. This will create and compound anxiety, and eventually cause enough conflict to create voices and hallucinations. We are also aware that this child has siblings. It will be crucial to acknowledge the serious negative impact that this case will also have on all these children.

It is our professional judgement that each Bexley Public Service in this case, with immediate effect, must stand down from having this child influenced with conflicting realities. The legal process must now be allowed to take place, for these public services to defend their accountability.

Strength of this child

In studying how positively this child reacts to being helped, and how hard this child is continuously trying to get their life back on track, we believe they do not have any type of disorder or deficiency. They are naturally and logically reacting to their experiences. For example, we have learned that some of the perpetrators in this case have advised this child to consider that they have autism. We can clearly see how this advice would benefit the perpetrators, but not this child. On 22/11/2018 at this child's school parents' evening, all their teachers said words to the effect, "your child does not have any problems learning", and "we are so very impressed by how hard your child works", and "your child's only problem is with their confidence". For a child to receive so many commendations from their teachers, it is highly unlikely for them to have any kind of learning deficiency. Given this child's remarkable performance each time their human rights are respected, this reaffirms the confusion of how they are forced to live a reality that they know is false.

NHS mental health

NHS mental health doctors like to give names to problems because it helps them treat their patients. The obvious downside to this is it encourages fraud by allowing welfare families to look up and practise symptoms to claim. Naming mental health issues does not help patients. This is because every person is different and every mental health diagnosis is subjective. It is never good for a patient, and especially for children, to be told they have any sort of “disorder”. An independent mental health expert may use the term “trauma-related mental health issues” to consult with experienced professionals. But if they were treating a patient for any negative experience, they would always be very careful around giving it any sort of name.

We have understood that this child had an NHS Mental Health therapist specialising in sexuality and gender, say to this child, “PTSD is a very serious long-term illness”. To call any trauma-related mental health issue an illness, and say it is long-term, is incorrect and against their code of conduct. PTSD is in fact, easily treated. It is a natural and logical reaction to trauma. A therapist in sexuality and gender should never be commenting outside of their field. The fact that they, and this child’s next therapist, ceased working for NHS Mental Health following our complaints against them, is a clear example of the NHS’s inexperience.

Far worse, is making such a wrongful statement to a patient who is being treated by NHS Mental Health, and just before they themselves diagnosed this child with PTSD symptoms. This will confuse the patient and a likely reaction could be the patient rejecting treatment and they could confuse their therapists.

NHS Mental Health Services

It is common knowledge that the NHS lacks specialist training to treat mental health. It is significantly lagging independent mental health services. NHS child mental health therapists are trained to first gain trust from their patients, so they become compliant. Then, using an outlawed technique proven to only compound mental health, without consulting the diagnosis with anyone else, they use this trust to instruct their patients to have a condition that will be easiest for them to treat. Or as in this case, for an ulterior motive.

The most corrupt abuse of this power was when this child was given the therapy session to convince them that they are independent. So that they would leave their home and go and live with another family who are patients of NHS Mental Health. This other family are being treated by the same NHS therapists.
